But even in its decline, it has given of itself to a much greater cause. Without the Deer Creek project, Central Utah would have been retarded in its growth many decades, and drought conditions in metropolitan Salt Lake could have been much more serious. In sacrifice such as this lies the story of Charleston. Sturdy pioneers carved homes from the wilderness and gave their children a better life. Those who followed built on their heritage to rear families of strength and vigor. Now the community has given of itself so that Utah may continue to be the star of the west, and that the desert shall blossom as the rose.
